

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION

In conclusion the writer wanted to introduce Dissociative Identity Disorder or more commonly known as DID. The writer introduces this mental illness through the story he writes. In the story the writer also tells how people who having this mental illness something did not recognize it for some time. The other reason why the writer decided to write this story is to entertain people through this story while introducing them with this rare mental illness.

As mentioned in the previous chapter before, the writer also faced several problems. The one the writer had the hardest is when he wanted to change what the writer had in mind into words that can easily be understood by the potential readers. Another one is when the writer wrote a dialog lines because the writer had hard time describing the tone when the character was speaking. During the writing process the writer also does some research on the technology used during the time in the story. The writer also doing research when creating the character name.

Mostly during his writing process, the writer would look up on other literary works to see their styles of writing. Even when using different point of view the writer used another work as a reference on how to describe the location, introducing a character or when describing an event or tone of the characters. As for other people who wanted to use the theme of Dissociative Identity Disorder, the writer suggests giving more detail on the characterization and setting.

For example, in the writer's story there isn't much detail on the setting of the place and time within it. That's because the writer didn't have full confidence about his writing skill when including a certain time frame within the story. As for the characterization the writer only gives out a several characters and not much detailed backstory. That's because the writer wanted to make a story that isn't complicated so the reader can follow the flow of story rather than getting confused.

Regarding to the theme of this project there are other theme that Ma Chung students can use such as sociopath and psychopath. Both of them are related to someone's behavior and their mental state. Sociopath and psychopath have some similarities and differences. The similarities between psychopath and sociopath would be lack of empathy.

While both lack in empathy, a sociopath tends to feel guilty or remorse though not as strong as normal people. In contrast, a psychopath would feel nothing if they did something wrong. A psychopath is more calculating and cold-hearted. While a sociopath only acts without thinking that their action will affect others. This kind of mental issue can be used as future theme in creative writing.
